Mental Care Policy

If you haven't had any mental illness in your family you're lucky. Many families are intimately familiar with it, and the proportion increases.

The problem is such a big one that the government -at all levels-is involved in it. The problem is complicated by economics. Ninety per cent of the patients at Newberry State Hospital, which cares for Upper Peninsula mental patients, are listed as indigents. They could not pay for their own care.

The problem of means also prevails in many cases where people need psychiatric service to avoid hospitalization and the situation is aggravated in the Upper Peninsula by the lack of psychiatric service, even where means may be available.

Michigan has not restructured its program of government care for mental patients to meet modern needs. It has tried to make do with what has been available and this has resulted in making the state's mental hospitals a catch-all for all sorts of patients. They were intended to care for the severely retarded and for the mentally ill.

When they are asked to care also for the senile who are only a bit loony because of the physical deterioration of advanced age; they are being asked to provide custodial care for a group with new dimensions in our society. There will be increasing numbers of senile persons because of the greatly extended life span.

Apart from the still inescapable need of providing custodial care for the severely retarded (and there's hope for progress in reducing their numbers with control of birth injuries, physiological factors and other contributing causes) mental hospitals' new outlook on their responsibility is increasingly one of treatment for release. This is an advance of uncalculable benefit to Washington Comment humanity.

It offers return to usefulness of many patients who earlier would have been regarded as ill beyond recovery. Many of these mental outpatients need continuing drug therapy, but so do many patients with physical ailments the Republicans' president- the GOP today is whether that By DR. GEORGE PAUL, an employe of Northern Cedarcraft is shown feeding a large log through a trimmer in preparation for cutting the cedar into pickets for the firm's rustic-type fencing. The plant is as busy as a beehive these days producing the fencing they have become so widely known for. Recently equipment was brought into the plant from their factory in Northome, Minn., which in some instances has doubled their capacity for producing the fencing. The major portion of the fencing is made up in sections for easy assembly. However, there is some shipment of "knocked-down" fencing which enables the purchaser to assemble it himself.
